How would I activate the.Development of a bifunctional antibody, chAP1, for the simultaneous detection of amelogenin and MMP20. Amelogenin, an enamel matrix protein of key significance in enamel formation, is a target for the development of enamel-based biomaterials. Here, we report the production of an anti-amelogenin monoclonal antibody (mAb), chAP1, and its use in conjunction with another anti-amelogenin mAb, mAb 1F10, to analyze amelogenin in enamel tissues. These antibodies can be used to detect the temporal and spatial distribution of amelogenin in rabbit enamel and in biopsies of human dental tissues. In addition, the antibodies can be used to detect and selectively remove amelogenin from dentin and enamel biopsies using antigen-capture adsorption. The bifunctional chAP1 antibody can also be used to detect matrix metalloproteinase 20 in mouse and bovine enamel matrices, implying the potential for this antibody to probe the roles of amelogenin in ameloblast differentiation and enamel formation. A chAP1-linked enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA) system was developed in order to measure the concentration of amelogenin in human whole blood. Furthermore, the chAP1 antibody was immobilized on epoxy-activated carbon to construct an amelogenin microarray. This anti-amelogenin microarray was used to analyze the function of amelogenin in the differentiation of ameloblasts. This invention relates generally to the art of programmable calculators and specifically to the generation and display of program flow charts for use in programmable calculators. Programmable calculators are available in a wide variety of sizes, with the largest programmable calculators being capable of performing many millions of arithmetic operations per second and being useful in a wide variety of commercial, scientific, and engineering applications. ba244e880a
