They were attacked, they were often underprepared, and they did it all with valour, bravery and honour. The Prime Minister could have fired them for incompetence or left them to die for his incompetence, but he kept them around and as a result we have rid ourselves of an evil, cruel regime. (1410) We are now seeing our soldiers come home safely. That is something this country should be very proud of. Mr. Speaker, I have visited with these great men and women who are home from Afghanistan. I have had the chance to visit with them and to thank them for the services they have given this country and the troops on the ground. I would be remiss if I did not mention the countrymen who have died in Afghanistan in the course of these missions. I can't begin to imagine the grief of these young soldiers. We should all be very proud of them, and we can be very proud of them here in Parliament. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for her kind words. We are proud of our soldiers, and we are proud of their families. I want to thank them all as well for their service, for their service is appreciated here. We are very, very proud of them. Mr. Speaker, it is always the great uncertainty of the future that excites an appetite for change. That is especially so when the political system changes, and then a new majority party is elected. We saw it happen in 2004, and we saw 2d92ce491b
