XP. Monoclonal antibodies and their applications in immunotherapy. Monoclonal antibodies have been used in a variety of important clinical applications. These applications include diagnosis and therapy of malignancies, transplantation rejection, drug discovery, and molecular and genetic research. Since the first introduction of mouse monoclonal antibodies in the late 1960s, other animal monoclonal antibodies have been developed. Further improvement in animal technology, such as the production of transgenic mice with desired antibody genes, has enabled the production of human monoclonal antibodies. The production of human monoclonal antibodies is now considered a routine procedure. This chapter reviews the history of the development of monoclonal antibodies, the current status of monoclonal antibody therapy, and the future direction of monoclonal antibody research. Prognostic significance of conventional and magnetic resonance imaging in peripheral nerve sheath tumors of the oral and maxillofacial region: A multicenter study. The purpose of this study is to report the clinical and radiological characteristics of peripheral nerve sheath tumors (PNST) of the oral and maxillofacial region, to present the oncologic prognostic factors and to identify the most appropriate imaging modality for early diagnosis and surgical planning. A retrospective analysis was performed in two medical centers between 2010 and 2014. Demographic, clinical, histological, and prognostic data were gathered from the clinical charts and radiological reports. A total of 40 PNSTs were included in this study.

The most common location was the head and neck region (62.5%). More than half of the tumors (57.5%) were benign, with mean size of 2.7 cm. The most frequent benign pathology was neurilemmoma (65.3%). Patients with malignant PNSTs presented with more aggressive clinical characteristics than those with benign PNSTs ( $p = 0.015$ ). The mean follow-up period was 9.8 months (range 0-54 months). Tumor recurrence occurred
