It seems like so many plants require fertilizer and compost, along with several other things, and the ultimate fertilizer for legumes is nitrogen. After all, that's what they thrive on. Am I right? The short answer is yes. The long answer is no. There are several reasons why. Where to begin? Even though nitrogen is plentiful in the soil, the soil itself can't absorb all of it. In fact, it does the opposite. Since the nitrogen is already in the soil, the plant absorbs it first, then it passes it back into the soil for the rest of the plants to use. This is called nitrogen cycling. Plants use it for many reasons and while some use it for growth, others use it to create toxins and destroy other plants. And that's where legumes come in. Legumes are defined by their root systems. While many plants have shallow root systems that only look for soil nitrogen, legumes have deep roots that go much deeper into the soil for nitrogen. This allows them to find and use nitrogen that other plants can't. Legumes add this layer of nitrogen to the soil for other plants to use. They provide the overall atmosphere in the soil to make sure that air is the right kind for bacteria to grow and break down other plants. Since they draw down the soil nutrients, they allow other plants in the rotation to get a leg up. The added leguminous cover crop pulls some of the nitrogen from the other plants and incorporates it into the soil. This in turn allows the other plants a better chance of survival because the soil is nourished. Does that sound complicated? It's not. The key is to remember that legumes don't benefit the soil by taking the nitrogen from the soil. They're benefitting the plants in the rotation. Too much
