Acronis True Image Registration Code For Windows Full Version Free DownloadIn conventional ball joints, an outer joint part (outer race) with a spherical bearing bore is pressed into a metal cylindrical part (cup race). An inner part (inner race) is pressed into the metal cylindrical part, and the ball bearings of the inner part are fit into the spherical bearing bore of the outer joint part. In order to ensure a smooth running of the ball bearings relative to the spherical bearing bore of the outer joint part, the inner part of the ball joint is spring-loaded. This means that a slight displacement of the outer joint part relative to the metal cylindrical part (cup race) leads to an increased resilient deformation of the inner part of the ball joint, which, in turn, leads to an increased contact pressure between the ball bearings and the spherical bearing bore of the outer joint part. If the outer joint part (outer race) is unintentionally displaced relative to the metal cylindrical part (cup race), a correspondingly large deformation of the inner part of the ball joint (inner race) takes place. As a result, the contact pressure between the ball bearings and the spherical bearing bore of the outer joint part increases, which, in turn, can lead to an increased wear of the ball bearings and, thus, to a reduced service life of the ball joint. In order to reduce the wear of the ball bearings, it is known to provide cylindrical lubricant reservoirs, which are provided with openings and are arranged in the interior of the ball joint, and into which lubricant can be introduced by way of oil lines. As a result, the ball bearings are flooded with lubricant and a, so-called, "thrust bearing effect" is produced, which, on the one hand, reduces the frictional forces between the ball bearings and the spherical bearing bore of the outer joint part and, on the other hand, eliminates the contact pressure between the ball bearings and the spherical bearing bore. In this connection, reference is made, in particular, to DE
