Cannabis law reformers say they don't want to legalize the drug because they want to legalize other drugs. What, exactly, is their reasoning? Is it so different from the standard logic that justifies the legalization of all illegal drugs? There's no doubt that we could see a swell in the number of Americans in jail if pot is legalized. As a result, some of the same forces that have made legalization of other drugs happen in certain jurisdictions would be behind a push for cannabis decriminalization. But that's a long way from legalizing. You don't need to look far to find examples of municipalities decriminalizing other drugs. Sure, says Matt Simon, cofounder of the California Cannabis Industry Association. But the federal government already has a strong hand in pot policy, he says. So why not focus on public health? "With the state government at least we can step back and let the states and localities do what they want," Simon said. I'm not convinced. There are a lot of reasons to decriminalize, but public health is not one of them. Reason #1: No health benefits After all, decriminalizing possession of a drug should not be about public health. That's the job of getting people to stop using drugs, not making them legal. And public health officials have been clear:
