Size: 230 Kbln our ever-expanding universe, millions of planets have been discovered, and thanks to current technological advances, an entire solar system has been confirmed to exist. But what would it look like if you had to live on one? Luckily, thanks to the work of scientists, we have an idea as to what a planet's surface might look like. It turns out that it is more likely to be a desert with lots of sand than a lush forest. A recent study was conducted by the University of Michigan, and published in Nature, in which a large group of scientists attempted to analyze the climate of all the solar systems that have been confirmed. In all, they discovered that 15 percent of the planets that exist are probably in a desert climate — because if it's a climate where you can survive, it's unlikely to be a lush forest, or a rolling savanna of grass. And if you were to take a stroll on a desert planet, you would probably get your feet wet quite a lot, since the conditions of the planet are usually really dry. The Mars' atmosphere is only about 0.003 the density of Earth's, and the surface is perpetually frozen. "Sand dunes or dust storms would be pretty common," one of the researchers told GlobalPost. So if you find yourself on a desert planet, you might be a little surprised to find yourself surrounded by a lot of sand.
