Double-stranded DNA (dsDNA) is an important molecular recognition unit in biosystems. This paper reports that adsorption-induced conformational changes in DNA structure are reversible and differentially occur with specific adsorption of a polyvalent cation. From the dependence of adsorption parameters on the salt concentration, the origin of the adsorption-induced change of the DNA structure is attributed to the electrostatic interaction between DNA molecules and counterions. Counterions are bound first on the free DNA ends, causing the DNA structure to change from an open to a closed conformation. The binding leads to an increase in the charge density of the adsorption surfaces, and further adsorption results in the formation of interstrand crosslinks that cause the end-to-end linkages to collapse. The interstrand
