outcome with the type of hemostasis screening test performed. A test for determining the presence or absence of hemostatic abnormalities other than that of the factor VIII (FVIII) inhibitor is most useful when testing a pregnant woman with hemophilia A. A test for FVIII inhibitor antibodies should be used only to screen pregnant women with severe hemophilia A. The best procedure for performing this test is to give the patient a series of two or more plasma dilutions of human plasma FVIII and then measure the FVIII activity in the patient's own plasma diluted to the same level as the plasma FVIII used for dilution. The FVIII activity in the patient's own plasma can then be compared to the activity in the same plasma when diluted to the same level as the plasma FVIII from the donor. The presence of an FVIII inhibitor antibody will be recognized by this test. This test is still being used and adapted as new sensitive assays for the inhibitor are developed.
The results of this test are compared to the results of a dilute inhibitor assay performed with the patient's own plasma and to results of a Bethesda assay performed with the patient's own plasma. A third determination of the results of the Bethesda assay can be made with the patient's plasma diluted to the same level as the plasma used for dilution of the inhibitor assay and using FVIII that has been standardized to a 100% FVIII antigen.Q:
