I've learned a lot about html5 already. So do I need to learn html5 as a CMS? Is there another document type for which I need to learn html5? A: Depends on what you need. If it's just writing HTML, I would recommend using an HTML5 web developer editor like Sublime Text 2. But if you want to be able to do a lot more in terms of templating, a CMS like Joomla or WordPress would be more useful. Having said that, there are definitely some advantages to using HTML5 as a backend for a web app, including the flexibility of being able to use CSS3 and the power of adding in new HTML5 elements, the board." "Uh, excuse me, sir." "Uh, you can't go through." "What?" "What?" "Stop." "No, I don't understand." "Uh, we're just looking for the deceased's brother." "The deceased's brother." "Oh, yes." "I'm afraid you'll have to wait here." "Actually, I don't think I can wait." "I'm sorry." "Hey, you want to try again

Q: Accessing Foreign Key in Django I have two models in my models.py file. One Model is a foreign key of the other. I'm using Django Admin and I want to be able to see the model I want to add in the Django Admin Panel. My question is, how do I access the model that is a foreign key to the model I want to add? Is there some easy way of doing this? A: Use the reverse() method on the foreign key field. Example: from django.contrib.auth.models import User class Book(models.Model): author = models.ForeignKey(User) def view_book(request): # do stuff here In other words, reverse() just wraps a ForeignKey instance in a QuerySet so you can do stuff with it. Q: Show that a C^1 function has a local minimum in an open interval Show that a C^1 function f has a local minimum in an open interval. A: The function f is continuous in some open interval (a,b) , therefore it is differentiable in this interval, therefore we can apply the ϵ - δ definition of a local minimum. Suppose f has no local minimum in (a,b) , but assume $c \in (a,b)$ is a local minimum. Then by definition for each $\epsilon > 0$ there exists $\delta > 0$ such that for all $x \in (a,b)$ if $|x - c| < \delta$
