Researchers at the University of Alberta are pioneering work that could soon make the computer-generated, 3-D images you are watching with Google Earth in the palm of your hand. Their research could bring the realistic visual effects that have been rippling through movies such as Avatar to desktop computers running on mobile devices and tablet PCs. "It will put the movie-like experience in your hands," said Dr. Robert Micken, a professor of electrical engineering at the University of Alberta in Canada. A headset with a display that can do everything from view billboards in Times Square to 3-D images could be "the ultimate in cyberspace," he said. The research, called VoxelSpace, uses what are known as "three-dimensional graphics" to digitally transform real world imagery into an array of small computer-generated cubes. It is the second spin-off of a much larger research project, announced in 2009, that has some similarities to Google Earth, which was released in 2005. "We might finally be able to see what people have been talking about since the 1980s," said Stan Sclaroff, the Canadian Space Agency's distinguished visitor for technology innovation. In the 1980s, he said, researchers figured out how to use digital images to generate three-dimensional graphics. A company called Tulip, based in Ottawa, has since adopted VoxelSpace's technique as its commercial product. It provides visitors to its website with an augmented reality display in which a person's computer-generated image is superimposed over the real world around him. By using a headset with a screen in front of its eyes, the user can "see" the real world as a 3-D hologram that he is looking at, with the user's computer-generated avatar hovering in front of him. The latter is the newest technology that the private sector is adopting as a
