Operating system Windows Mobile 6.1 or later. Earlier versions of Windows Mobile require Windows Mobile 6.5 or later. Processor 1.0 GHz or higher with 32-bit ARM processor (ARMv7) Memory 512 MB of RAM or higher Resolution 128 x 128 or higher Internet connection Online services require dial-up or high-speed Internet access (provided separately local or long-distance charges might apply). High-speed Internet access is recommended for some features. Graphics card Windows Mobile 6.5 or higher requires OpenGL ES 1.0 or higher. For OpenGL ES 2.0, Windows Mobile 7 or 8 can also support OpenGL ES 2.0. Graphics cards that support OpenGL ES 2.0 will run either application. Step-by-Step Download & Installation Instructions A new Windows Live service for Mobile is available for Windows Mobile-based devices. It's functionally similar to the new full view of Windows Live Hotmail, except that it's designed for devices like smart phones and PDAs. But Hotmail is really the core and foundation of Windows Live. It was the lead email client of the initial version of the suite, and now Hotmail is a shell for all the other connected services. So it must be one heck of a reliable email client, right? The answer is yes, and no. And here's why. First and foremost, Hotmail works pretty well as a standalone email client. When you're creating an account, you can choose between a traditional Hotmail look and feel, and a classic view that looks more like a traditional Hotmail. And it works pretty well with other IM clients. There's no Thunderbird-like dependency here, and the web-based versions of Windows Live Messenger, which includes Windows Live Messenger 2010, does not depend on Hotmail either. Obviously, if your IM client of choice doesn't work with Hotmail, then you're out of luck. But my point is that if you're going to be accessing Hotmail from a stand-alone application, then you may be disappointed. It might not look like what you're used to, but once you get used to it, you may find that the Hotmail experience is a lot better than you expected. 5ec8ef588b
